

The Three Mariners is a Grade II listed building that dates back to the 17th Century. The central serving area remains the original part of the building, whilst the dining room was a 19th Century addition which formed part of the long rows of tenements that ran along both sides of Bridge Lane.

The cobbled street outside was at one time the main route into the city over the river, and the narrow street would have been bustling with sailors and merchants that were docked on the quay. Sadly the river became too heavily laden with silt to allow commercial vessels to pass this far up the river during the early 20th Century.

There has been a hostelry on the site since the 15th Century, some of which remains today. Throughout its lifetime it has played a part in Lancaster's rich history, from housing Jacobite soldiers during troubled times to playing host to the last drink for prisoners as they were led from Lancaster Castle on their way to be hanged. Rumours abound of a hidden passage linking the inn with the castle's dungeons.

Originally called the Red Lion, and then named The Three Mariners, the inn was known as The Carpenters Arms through much of the 20th Century, so named for the many ship-building businesses in the area.

This rich history has been absorbed into the very fabric of the building itself, with numerous sightings of ghosts and reports of paranormal activity. An ethereal woman in a large dress resides on the first floor, whilst a gentleman dressed as a Jacobite has been seen seated by the fire and walking along Bridge Lane outside.

One of the younger members of the Leighton family that run The Three Mariners also saw three ladies upstairs within weeks of moving in, but assures us all that they were nice ladies.

Today The Three Mariners offers a time-tested home-cooked menu alongside a large range of cask ales, cooled upstairs in our gravity-fed cellar cut into the castle rock.

All of our meals are freshly made using ingredients from local suppliers. Please see our daily specials board situated in the dining area or ask staff for more information about our additional dishes.
